This study examined the initial adoption and use of a resistance framework among a sample of mothers of children diagnosed with an eating disorder. In-depth interviews were conducted with 30 mothers of children with bulimia nervosa and/or binge eating. A thematic analysis of the interviews demonstrated that the mothers moved through four phases of adoption and use of a resistance framework. The adoption of a resistance framework involved moving toward a resistance model, understanding resistance within the context of their relationship with their eating disorder, and finally achieving mastery of resistance. The adoption of a resistance framework was influenced by the women's previous experiences with their children's eating disorders, the interactions they had with health professionals, and the thoughts they developed about themselves, their children, and their children's eating disorders. The adoption of a resistance framework also involved having specific milestones that the women had to reach before feeling successful in adopting a resistance framework.
